Introduction

The aim of this guidance

This document provides detailed information of good practice in pre-employment screening, an important element of any personnel security regime. It includes a range of advice and guidance from government and other organisations as a ‘one-stop’ reference handbook focusing on a variety of measures.

This guidance is intended to support those within organisations which form part of the UK Critical National Infrastructure (CNI), such as Human Resources (HR), Recruitment, Hiring Managers and Security departments, who have responsibility for employment screening. It may also be of value to the wider business community, and we would encourage these organisations to use this guidance as they see fit.

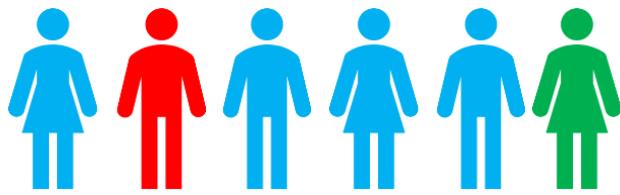

Whilst this guidance aims to be as comprehensive as possible, it is not exhaustive. NPSA recommends that organisations seek professional advice, especially on employment law, when implementing or amending their personnel security measures.

This guidance should be read in conjunction with other NPSA publications, which are available at <https://www.npsa.gov.uk>.

Employment screening

Employment screening seeks to verify the credentials of job applicants and to check that they meet preconditions of employment (e.g. that they are legally permitted to take up an offer of employment). When conducting checks, it should be established whether the applicant has concealed important information or otherwise misrepresented themselves. To this extent, employment screening may be considered a test of character.

The ways in which employment screening is performed vary greatly between organisations. In every case, the aim of employment screening is to obtain information about prospective or existing staff (if promoted and/or changing jobs in the organisation), to use that information to identify individuals who may present security concerns.

Employment screening is the foundation of good personnel security. It allows you to confirm the identity and credentials of those you are granting access to your sites and information, reduces the likelihood of an insider harming your business.

An insider is someone (a permanent, temporary or contract worker) who exploits, or has the intention to exploit, their legitimate access to an organisation's assets for unauthorised purposes.

British Standard 7858

BS7858 sets out recommendations for the security screening of individuals to be employed in an environment where the security and/or safety of people, services, personal data or property is a requirement of the employing organisation's operations or where such screening is in the public or corporate interest. The Standard is used widely in the private sector by organisations in their pre-employment screening processes, and by third party screening companies undertaking pre-employment screening checks for organisations.

BS7858:2019 (version 5) comprises:

- proof of identity and address (wherever possible, supporting documentation should be photographic);
- details of education and employment;
- criminal records check;
- financial check; and
- confirmation of holding a current and valid Security Industry Authority (SIA) licence (if applicable to the role).

The Standard sets the minimum screening period at three years, with no unverified gaps greater than 31 days. It states that full screening should be completed no later than 12 weeks after employment has commenced (for checks totalling five years), or 16 weeks (where the checks are for longer than 5 years). (N.B. NPSA recommends that pre-employment screening is completed before employment has commenced or, depending on outstanding checks, as soon as possible after – see the chapter on decision making).

The HMG Baseline Personnel Security Standard

The Baseline Personnel Security Standard (BPSS – generally referred to as the ‘Baseline Standard’) aims to provide, by application of a common ‘standard’, an appropriate level of assurance as to the trustworthiness, integrity and reliability of prospective civil servants, members of the armed forces, temporary staff and government contractors generally. It also forms the basis for any subsequent National Security Vetting¹ (NSV) requirement.

Version 6.0 of the Baseline Standard was implemented by the Cabinet Office in May 2018. It comprises verification of:

- identity;
- nationality and immigration status (including entitlement to undertake the work in question);
- employment history (minimum past three years); and
- unspent criminal convictions.

Additionally, applicants are required to give a reasonable account of any significant periods (six months or more in the past three years) of time spent abroad.

This guidance closely reflects the Baseline Standard and describes the same types of checks. However, the Baseline Standard contains some advice and supporting mechanisms which are specific to the government sector and are not, therefore, included in this guidance.

Further information on the Baseline Standard can be found at

¹ NSV seeks to determine an individual’s suitability to hold posts with long-term, frequent and uncontrolled access to government-classified material, or for posts involving access to individuals, establishments or information assessed to be at risk from or of value to terrorism or espionage.

Legislation

LEGISLATION

Employment screening practices and procedures must be compatible with all relevant legislation. Legislation such as the Human Rights Act, Data Protection Act and Rehabilitation of Offenders Act must be complied with to ensure that employment screening procedures do not interfere with the individual's right to privacy, disclose any information which organisations may find in an inappropriate way or without due cause, or use information in a discriminatory way.

Always check with your legal advisors.

Employment screening policy

Employment screening should form an integral part of your policies, practices and procedures for recruiting employees. Robust employment screening policies will ensure that processes are consistent, fair and efficient, maintain an organisation's reputation, and reduce the risk of business disruption or financial losses. This chapter highlights some of the issues to consider when planning a pre-employment screening programme.

A Role Based Risk Assessment will help you identify the different types of risks that different roles present, consider how these risks might affect the level of screening, and decide on the levels of screening that are appropriate for different posts. Further advice can be obtained at:

<https://www.npsa.gov.uk/insider-risks/role-based-security-risk-assessment>.

Employment screening levels

One of the most important aspects of a pre-employment screening strategy is deciding what employment checks to perform for each post. Some employers perform the same checks for all new applicants, regardless of the post. However, this can add unnecessary delays to the recruitment process. You may prefer to vary the screening process according to the risks that the post presents.

Minimum level of checks	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Verify identity; confirm residency and the right to work in the UK; and ensure that applicants complete a self-declaration criminal record form (see Appendix 6).
Medium level of checks	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Minimum level of checks; Basic criminal record disclosure (see chapter on criminal record checks); most recent academic qualifications (see chapter on qualifications and employment checks); relevant professional qualifications; most recent employer reference, including dates of employment (at least three years, preferably five years); and media checks (see chapter on media searches).
High level of checks	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Minimum and Medium level of checks; basic confirmation with employers of dates of employment, posts held and reasons for leaving, and line manager references (if possible); financial enquiries (see chapter on financial checks).

Who should be involved in the process?

The size and structure of your business and the level and nature of the post is likely to determine which areas of your business will have a stake in ensuring that employment screening is effective. The most active participants in the process are likely to include:

- Human Resources (HR) – In many organisations, HR departments will take the lead on the selection and recruitment of employees. They will normally be responsible for conducting or commissioning verification checks. It is vital, therefore, that HR personnel have a sound understanding of employment screening.
- Security personnel – In a significant number of organisations, the security department is responsible for employment screening. Even where this is not the case, the security department will be responsible for dealing with security concerns that emerge from the employment screening checks, as well as decisions about the levels of checks that may be required for different posts.
- Business owners and managers – The involvement and support of business owners and managers are crucial to implementing robust employment screening. They will usually play a greater role in recruitment in smaller organisations, including leading the interview process.
- Legal personnel – Legal personnel play a critical role in the development of employment screening processes. They should be consulted in the production of all documents, forms and processes used for screening purposes.
- Other relevant departments – These may include regulatory bodies, staff representation and unions, procurement and auditors.

Senior ownership of the employment screening process

It is advisable that one senior member of the organisation takes ownership of the employment screening process, which will be actioned by that person's department.

They should work with all relevant parts of the organisation to ensure that protocols such as information sharing are agreed and adhered to, and that the whole organisation understands the importance of employment screening.

Other duties for the lead department may include training the teams involved in the screening process, and ensuring that screening procedures are appropriately designed to fit within the overall business plan.

Application form

This is a standardised form where the applicant can provide all relevant information and confirm (by signature) that the information is correct. It should provide the majority, if not all of the information required for pre-employment screening. The following is a list of likely information requirements, which are discussed in this guidance:

- Full name – including previous names or other names used.
- Date of birth – asking for age-related information on an application form may be seen as discriminatory under the Equality Act 2010. You should consider removing this from the main application form and include it in a diversity monitoring form to be retained by HR.

- Current address – do you also require previous addresses? If so, how far back do you go? This may be determined by the search requirements of certain checks e.g. County Court Judgments (CCJ), directorships, regulatory and/or NSV requirements.
- Employment history
- Education history – including full course details and contact details for the establishment.
- Criminal history – You should define the exact data you require i.e. convictions or conditional discharges. For most jobs only unspent convictions can be requested.
- Clear statement that pre-employment screening will take place – failure to provide accurate information may result in the application not being taken forward. This is important from a legal perspective, but can also have significant deterrent value.
- Consent by the applicant to undergo pre-employment screening
- Permission to contact the current employer
- Additional information – as required for specific cases.

You may need to customise the application form depending on the post. For example, you may not require full education history for semi-skilled staff, but you may require additional information for senior posts. Applicants should be clear what information is required, and employers should not request information which is irrelevant to the post.

Interviews

As well as providing an opportunity to discuss the applicant's suitability for employment, an interview will play an integral part of the pre-employment screening process because:

- it encourages the applicant to be honest;
- it allows the employer to find out missing information which is relevant to the pre-employment process and to probe applicants about their responses or for additional information; and
- it provides a good opportunity to add to the overall assessment of the applicant's reliability and integrity.

Use of third parties

If you use an external screening company or recruitment agency, it is important to be clear how their services fit into your processes and standards. You should be clear whether the third party is conducting part or all of the checks for each applicant. Where you are asking a third party to make judgements, you should ensure that these follow agreed decision making guidelines. You should reserve the right to audit your third party's procedures.

It is important to remember that you own and need to manage effectively the risk of granting the contractor access to your sites and assets, not the contractor organisation or agency. It is your responsibility for making any final decision which will impact on your business.

Decision making

Most of the employment screening checks do not require interpretation, the information provided is either true or false. However, for checks where judgement is involved, it is advisable to agree some decision making guidelines. For example, if you conduct a credit worthiness check, you should decide the criteria for an unacceptable credit report.

Your employment screening strategy should set out how you deal with the results of all checks, particularly potentially adverse information. This is explored in more detail in the chapter on decision making.

Screening during employment

There may be instances where further screening is required once an individual has joined an organisation. These could include transfer to a post with additional responsibilities (e.g. financial or HR), promotion, commencement of a new contract, or regulatory or NSV requirements. The checks may be similar to those outlined above, but may not require as much detail as the initial screening checks.

These checks must be reasonable, proportionate, and meet an organisation's business requirements. They should not be used as part of an ongoing investigation or disciplinary procedure.

Structuring the employment screening process

You may find it useful to maintain a verification record detailing what checks have been undertaken and confirming the results of these checks. An example of a verification record is provided at Appendix 1.

Identity

Of all the employment screening checks, identity verification is the most fundamental. It should be the first check that is performed, and you should not undertake any further parts of the screening process until you are satisfied that an applicant's identity is satisfactorily proven.

What is identity?

There are three elements to a person's identity:

- Biometric identity: the attributes that are biologically determined and unique to an individual i.e. facial structure, fingerprints, retina, voice, DNA profile.
- Attributed identity: the components of a person's identity that are given at birth, including name, place or birth and parents' names.
- Biographical identity: an individual's personal history including, but not limited to, registration of birth, addresses, education and qualifications, employment history, or registration of marriage or civil partnership.

Identity fraud

There are four main reasons why individuals use false identities:

- To avoid detection – e.g. illegal immigrants, terrorists, wanted criminals, disqualified drivers and those with a poor credit history.
- For dishonest financial gain – this can include falsifying educational qualifications to obtain employment, credit fraud or welfare benefits fraud.
- To avoid financial liability – this can include failing to pay debts or taxes.
- To illegally obtain genuine documents – such as passports through the use of false 'breeder documents' (i.e. those documents required to obtain passports, such as birth certificates, which can have few or no security features).

It is therefore important to have a comprehensive document verification process, focusing on establishing the authenticity of every document an applicant produces.

How to verify identity

The paper-based approach

By examining documents presented by an applicant, you are aiming to corroborate their full name (forenames and last name), signature, date of birth, and full permanent address. You should require applicants to provide:

1. An official document containing their photograph, such as a passport or driving licence. This will provide you with an opportunity to compare the photograph with the individual presenting the document (in order to prevent instances of imposters, or 'look-a-likes').
2. A document providing their current address (see below).

The ideal document:

- is issued by a trustworthy and reliable source;
- is difficult to forge;
- is dated and current;
- contains the owner's name, photograph and signature; and
- requires evidence of identity before being issued.

There is no definitive list of identifying documents, and not all documents are of equal value. However, ideal documents include passports, driving licences and national identity cards. Where a signature has not previously been provided, the applicant should be asked to provide it at a later date (e.g. at interview) for checking against relevant documentation.

Wherever possible, original documents should be used for identification purposes. You should not accept any copies, unless they have been certified by a solicitor. If documents issued via the internet have been presented to you (e.g. utility bills or a bank/building society statement), these can be used in conjunction with other independently-issued documents to verify address. A list of documents you might consider requesting can be found at Appendix 2.

What to do if the applicant cannot provide photographic documentation

You should ask the applicant to provide additional documents and a passport-sized photograph. This should be endorsed on the back with the signature of a 'person of standing' in the individual's community such as a magistrate, medical practitioner, officer of the armed forces, teacher, lecturer, lawyer, bank manager or civil servant, who has known the applicant for at least three years. The photograph should be accompanied by a signed statement from that person, indicating the period of time that the applicant has been known to them.

You should check the statement to ensure that the signature matches the one on the back of the photograph, and that it contains a legible name, address and telephone number. You must then contact the signatory to confirm that they did, in fact, write the statement.

Verifying addresses

The purpose of this check is to confirm that the address exists and relates to a real property, and to establish that the applicant permanently resides or previously resided at that address. As a prospective employer you should judge whether you need to ask for more than the applicant's current address. This will depend on the post.

To verify an address, you can:

- ask the applicant to provide documentation to confirm residence at the address they have given and/or
- carry out an electronic identity database search (see below). This will check previous addresses against databases such as the Electoral Register.

Gaps in residence details

If you require applicants to provide addresses that cover a lengthy period of time (e.g. five years or more), they may have gaps that they are not able to account for, such as foreign residence or travel, or custodial prison sentences.

To confirm an applicant's activities during gaps, you can do the following:

- Identify thresholds for undertaking checks. For example, if the period is less than three months, you may decide that it is neither necessary nor proportionate to confirm activities during that time.
- Ask the applicant to provide relevant documentation to cover the period in question.
- Check that the applicant's passport contains stamps for the countries they claim to have visited. If the stamps are absent (e.g. European countries), request other documentation to confirm their stay in those countries.
- If the applicant was living abroad, ask them to provide confirmation of the address. If they were working abroad, you should also verify their employment.
- If you use a commercial sector screening company to verify identity, they may be able to carry out gap analysis. Make sure you know what their capabilities are before accepting their tender (see the chapter on commercial sector screening services).

The advantages of a paper-based approach

The paper-based approach allows original documentation to be closely examined, particularly in the presence of the applicant. If necessary, this can include the use of an ultra-violet (UV) light source and magnifying glasses to increase the prospect of identifying any basic forgeries. Good Practice Guide on Pre-Employment Screening – Document Verification provides detailed guidance on this process.

The disadvantages of a paper-based approach

Some documents can be easily forged or bought. Advances in electronic equipment and software have resulted in an increase in high quality forged and counterfeit documents.

Document verification can be time-consuming, particularly for less experienced staff who may not be aware of the range of security features found in passports, identity cards, driving licences etc. Often only experts will be able to identify sophisticated forgeries.

The electronic approach to identity verification

Rather than relying on a physical assessment of documentation, the electronic approach seeks instead to verify identity by checking and cross-referencing information from databases such as criminal records or credit reference agencies.

By searching for records associated with the name, date of birth and addresses provided by an applicant, it is possible to build a picture of the applicant's past and current life. A long history of varied transactions and events indicates that the identity is more likely to be genuine. A history that lacks detail and/or depth may indicate that the identity is false.

Database checks alone are not sufficient to confirm that the applicant is the rightful owner of that identity - they simply confirm that the identity exists. You must test the applicant's knowledge of the information you have obtained from the electronic check to confirm that the applicant owns and is rightfully using the identity.

The advantages of the electronic approach

The electronic approach is based on testing biographical rather than attributed identity, assessing an applicant's footprint in the UK. Creating a long-term and in-depth identity is a big challenge for fraudsters. Minimal training is required to use the software, and results can be received in real time, or with short turnaround periods.

The disadvantages of the electronic approach

The electronic approach loses its value if the applicant is not tested on the data produced by the search. The results simply demonstrate that the identity exists. It does not provide an opportunity to make a face-to-face assessment of the applicant.

Young candidates or those who have recently arrived in the UK are unlikely to have built up a ‘footprint’ in the UK. They may be ineligible to vote and so do not appear on the Electoral Roll, or they may not have a bank account, credit cards or a mortgage, and so will not have developed an in-depth credit history.

The databases and data sources used for identity verification may contain inaccurate or out of date information. Human and system error can result in duplicate records being created or data input errors. Some duplicates may be raised as a result of deliberate fraud.

Some databases may hold records in excess of the expected population. These may include records for people who are deceased or who no longer reside in the UK.

Issues to consider when procuring an electronic identity service

- What are the data sources? How accurate is the data? How often is data updated?
- Are there data protection issues concerning the databases and/or the applicant’s data?
- When the applicant’s data is entered into a system, will there be a footprint? For example, would someone be able to discover that the applicant is connected to your organisation? This may be relevant if you are considering employing high profile individuals in sensitive posts where discretion is important.

A combined approach

Both the paper-based and electronic approaches have key strengths. You should therefore adopt a combined approach, at least for some posts. This will allow you to verify the applicant’s original documentation and benefit from the comprehensiveness of the electronic approach.

Prevention of illegal working: verification of nationality and immigration status

The legislation governing ‘right to work’ in the UK is the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Act 2006, amended by the Immigration Act 2014. Employers may be liable for a civil penalty or criminal conviction for employing a person aged 16 or over who is subject to immigration control unless:

- that person has been authorised to be in the United Kingdom by the Government, and is permitted to take the job in question; or
- the person comes into a category where employment is permitted.

An employer who knowingly employs an illegal worker can face a maximum of two years imprisonment, and/or an unlimited fine.

An employer who is negligent or not sufficiently diligent at establishing a ‘right to work’ as part of their recruitment and employment practices may receive a civil penalty of up to £20,000 per illegal worker. Fines are calculated on a case-by-case basis, set out in the civil penalty scheme code of practice².

Legislation provides employers with a statutory excuse if they check and record certain documents belonging to applicants. These checks must be carried out before an applicant is employed in order to obtain the statutory excuse. However, the excuse will not be available if the employer knowingly employs an illegal migrant worker. Further information on statutory excuse is available at:

https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/969123/An_employer_s_guide_to_right_to_work_checks.pdf.

Equally, where a person presents a document and it is reasonably apparent that the person presenting the document is not the person referred to in that document, even if the document itself is genuine, you may be liable to prosecution for knowingly employing an illegal worker.

Further guidance

The UK Visas and Immigration site on gov.uk³ provides advice and guidance on preventing illegal working, including employer’s guides to right to work checks and acceptable right to work documents, frequently asked questions, and right to work and statutory excuse checklists.

Post BREXIT

Nationals of the European Union (EU), the European Economic Association (EEA) and Switzerland are entitled to work in the UK if they have approval as part of the EU Settlement Scheme. Further information can be obtained from: <https://www.gov.uk/eusettledstatus>

Qualification and employment checks

Confirmation of an applicant's qualifications and employment history will help employers to build up a picture of the applicant's reliability and integrity. These checks can also help identify those applicants attempting to conceal adverse information such as a dismissal from previous employment. This chapter provides guidance for employers who carry out their own pre-employment screening.

Qualification and employment checks carried out by a third party supplier are discussed in the chapter commercial sector screening companies.

Qualification checks

A qualification check verifies information provided by the applicant on their application form or Curriculum Vitae (CV) for educational or professional qualifications. It should confirm:

- the establishment attended;
- course dates;
- title of the course (if the applicant has included details of courses studied it is advisable to check them); and
- grades awarded.

For each post you should consider whether it is proportionate to confirm the applicant's qualifications.

You may wish to confirm professional qualifications and membership of any professional bodies, regardless of the time that has passed. For example, an engineer or accountant who qualified 20 years ago should not automatically be exempt from having their qualifications verified.

You should always request original copies of any certificates and compare the information provided on them with what is included on the application form. For example:

- Do the names match? The applicant should provide an explanation if not.
- Does the date(s) on the certificate match the date(s) on the application form?
- Is there any difference in the title of the course studied or the grades awarded?

Many certificates will be printed on good quality paper which may be embossed, include an intricate crest with motto, and a watermark. If you have any doubts about a certificate (including any spelling or grammatical errors), you should discuss your concerns with the education establishment or professional body in question.

You should contact the establishment directly to request confirmation of the applicant's attendance, course details and grades awarded. You may be required to provide a copy of the applicant's signed consent form and may need to allow several weeks for a response.

If resource constraints make this approach impossible, you should at least aim to:

- compare the details on the certificate with those on the application form; and
- independently confirm the existence of the establishment, for example through an internet search, including contact details, logos or crests, and mottos.

Degree and accreditation mills

Degree mills (also known as diploma mills), are mostly online entities which offer substandard or bogus degrees in exchange for payment, with little or no work involved.

Accreditation mills are bogus accreditation agencies which are not recognised by the authorities responsible for governing education provision in their country of operation. They offer accreditation for a fee, and will carry out little or no investigation into the quality of education provided by the institution they claim to accredit. Over 330 accreditation mills exist in the UK⁴.

Obtaining degrees through degree and accreditation mills devalues legitimate education by flooding the market with sub-standard degrees. Applicants who provide certificates from these mills as proof of education may in many cases be unqualified for the post they are applying for, and may obtain a pecuniary advantage for a post they are not entitled to hold. This may cause severe business, financial and reputational damage to organisations should this information come to light. It is important that employers check the accreditation and authorisation to award degrees of the institution granting the accreditation.

UK National Information Centre (UK ENIC)

UK ENIC (formerly UK NARIC) is the UK's national agency responsible for the recognition and evaluation of international qualifications and skills. It assists overseas applicants to understand how their qualifications relate to those in the UK. It enables employers to process applications from individuals with international qualifications efficiently and effectively.

Further information can be found at: <https://www.enic.org.uk/>

Higher Education Degree Datacheck (HEDD)

HEDD is a fee-paying internet service which allows employers to verify a current or past student's place of study, dates of attendance and the award and grade received. It holds details of recognised UK institutions and bogus institutions.

Further information can be found at <https://hedd.ac.uk>.

⁴ Diploma and Accreditation Mills: New Trends in Credential Abuse (Verifile, March 2011)

Employment checks

The verification process should confirm:

- the dates of employment;
- position(s) held;
- duties;
- salary;
- reason for leaving; and
- any employment gaps.

The applicant's current employer should not normally be contacted without prior permission from the applicant.

It is advisable to verify a minimum of three years of previous employment (at least five years for full screening). Ideally, you should check a period which covers at least two positions with separate employers (although this may not always be possible).

Employer references

You may wish to consider obtaining personal references from the applicant's previous or current line managers. These can provide a useful level of assurance about an applicant's integrity and track record. However, many employers only permit references to be provided by the HR department.

Employers may be cautious to comment upon their former employee's character, not least because of the risks of litigation from actionable statements. References tend therefore to focus on giving brief details of the employee's dates of employment and job title. However, references should:

- be true, accurate and fair in substance;
- offer facts, not opinions; and
- not conceal facts which are relevant to the new role. Where a reference refers to negative matters, such as disciplinary proceedings, they should be accurate and factual.

Employers tend to avoid giving references at all if there is a risk that they may give rise to a dispute.

You should confirm the existence of the employer (e.g. that it appears in relevant business directories), and contact them to confirm that they have provided the reference, and discuss its contents. A record of any conversation should be made. Telephone numbers supplied by the applicant should not be wholly relied upon.

Standardised reference form

Standard employee reference forms identify relevant information, and minimise the effort required by those providing the references to prompt a timely response. See Appendix 3 for an example of a standard reference template.

Pre-prepared references

The applicant may provide pre-prepared references. You should take reasonable steps to ensure they are genuine (see above), particularly if they appear less than genuine (e.g. provided on poor quality paper or containing basic spelling or grammatical errors).

Overseas references

Every effort should be made to obtain references from overseas employers.

In many European countries, an employer will issue a written reference to employees when they leave an organisation. This is an official document and is recognised as the reference in countries where this is issued.

Also in many European countries, every worker will possess a government-issued labour book. This will contain information on an employee's entire employment history, including changes in roles, leaving an employer, and joining a new one. Employers in these countries may not issue a separate reference. You should therefore ask the applicant to produce their labour book in these cases.

Self-employment references

For periods of self-employment, evidence should be obtained to confirm that the applicant's business was properly conducted and was terminated successfully. This could include information from HMRC and/or Companies House, bankers, accountants, solicitors or client references.

Other types of reference

If an employer's reference is not available, a second personal reference should be obtained from a referee of some standing in the applicant's community (e.g. a doctor or lawyer).

If the applicant has been in full time education, a reference should be obtained from the relevant academic institution.

Your checks may return information which contradicts the details provided by the applicant. You should proceed in a sensitive manner – there may be a reasonable explanation for apparent inconsistencies. You should also address any concerns you may have with the applicant, for example at an interview.

When you have established the facts, you should consider them within the context of all the screening results to support a balanced and reasonable decision.

Criminal record checks

For some, if not all posts, you may have identified criteria for deciding whether prior criminality precludes an applicant from taking up those posts (e.g. fraud convictions for financial posts, or driving offences for positions where driving is involved). In these circumstances, you will wish to seek information on the applicant's criminal record.

Requirements to disclose spent and unspent convictions

The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act (ROA) 1974 (amended by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act (LASPO) 2012) and the Rehabilitation of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 establish that a criminal conviction becomes spent if an offender remains free of further convictions for a specified period. The length of the rehabilitation period depends on the sentence given, not the offence committed (see Appendix 5). Custodial sentences of more than four years never become spent.

A conviction is described as unspent if the rehabilitation period associated with it has not yet lapsed.

Under the ROA a person is not normally required to disclose spent convictions when applying for a job (but see below). Having spent convictions, or failing to disclose them, are not normally grounds for exclusion from employment. If an applicant discloses information about spent convictions without being legally obliged to, the employer cannot act upon that knowledge. The following clauses from the ROA should be noted:

- Section 4(2) (b) – An applicant cannot be subjected to any liability or otherwise prejudiced for failing to acknowledge or disclose a spent conviction.
- Section 4(3) (b) – Failure to disclose the details or existence of spent convictions is not a lawful ground for dismissing or excluding any person from employment.

However, the ROA does state that it is reasonable for employers to ask applicants for details of any unspent criminal convictions.

Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 (Exceptions) Order 1975 and the Rehabilitation of Offenders (Exception) Order (Northern Ireland) 1979

These orders identify the types of position and employment that are exempt from the protection offered by the ROA 1974 and the Rehabilitation of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Order 1978, even where the conviction is spent. The employer is entitled to a full history of spent and unspent convictions as part of the pre-employment screening process. The types of position to which the exemptions apply include:

- professions such as medical practitioners, barristers, accountants and other financial service positions, vets and opticians;
- those employed to uphold the law e.g. judges, police officers and prison officers;
- certain regulated occupations including directors of insurance companies, taxi drivers, firearms dealers and those in charge of certain types of nursing homes;
- those whose work is concerned with the provision of care services to vulnerable adults and/or the provision of health services, and those who work with children; and
- those whose work could put national security at risk such as air traffic controllers and certain employees of the Crown.

Employers face a minimum £10,000 fine if they seek to force an applicant to provide their criminal record by making a subject access request under section 56 of the DPA if they are not entitled to ask for this. A full list of occupations eligible for criminal records checks can be found at www.gov.uk/government/publications/dbs-check-eligible-positions-guidance.

Organisations may become a registered body with the three organisations that provide criminal convictions information about applicants (if they process more than 100 eligible per checks per year). Alternatively, employers may contract with an umbrella organisation (for example, an external screening company), which can undertake checks on behalf of the organisation.

Disclosure Scotland and Access Northern Ireland (AccessNI)

Disclosure Scotland (www.disclosurescotland.co.uk/) and Access NI (<https://www.justice-ni.gov.uk/articles/about-accessni>) provide Basic, Standard and Enhanced disclosures (see below) to organisations, employers, public bodies, and organisations within the voluntary sector.

Disclosure and Barring Service (DBS)

The DBS (www.gov.uk/government/organisations/disclosure-and-barring-service) provides Basic, Standard and Enhanced disclosures in England and Wales.

All three organisations have access to the same type of information (e.g. data held on the Police National Computer (PNC) and information held on the lists of excluded persons held by the Department of Health and Department for Education). Ordinarily, registered bodies will utilise the service appropriate to their geographical boundaries (although employers based in England can use Disclosure Scotland for Basic disclosures). The three organisations will regularly share appropriate information from their data sources to ensure that a comprehensive disclosure is issued where an applicant has resided in all jurisdictions.

The cost of obtaining criminal records depends on the level of the disclosure. You should inform applicants who will pay or be expected to pay for the disclosure. In the case of the applicant, you should inform them whether they will be reimbursed.

Types of disclosure

There are four types of disclosure available to you:

1: Criminal record declaration

You may wish to request that applicants complete a criminal record declaration form (see Appendix 6). This declaration, which the applicant has to sign, asks them to provide information about any unspent criminal convictions. It relies on the honesty of the applicant to provide complete and accurate information. If they provide a false declaration, there is no way of confirming this unless a Basic disclosure is applied for. For reasons of transparency, the criminal declaration form should make it clear if such a check will be carried out.

2: Basic disclosure – provides unspent convictions

3: Standard disclosure – provides spent and unspent convictions

4: Enhanced disclosure – provides spent and unspent convictions and may contain local police information

The DBS only issues disclosure certificates to the applicant, rather than the employer. You should ask for sight of the applicant's disclosure certificate.

DBS Update Service

This paid for service enables:

- applicants to keep their DBS certificates up to date
- employers to check a DBS certificate

Further information available at: www.gov.uk/dbs-update-service.

Cautions, Reprimands and Final Warnings

Cautions, reprimands and final warnings are not criminal convictions and are not covered by the ROA. If applicants with cautions, reprimands or final warnings are asked if they have any criminal convictions or a criminal record, they can answer in the negative. If employers wish to ask if applicants have cautions, reprimands or final warnings, they should ensure they are legally entitled to ask this under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 (Exceptions) Order 1975 (Amendment) (England and Wales) Order 2013, which prohibits certain old or minor convictions and cautions from being the subject of disclosure⁵.

Assessing criminal records information

Your criteria should allow for the fact that a conviction – spent or unspent – should not necessarily be a bar to employment. Equally, they should indicate, as far as possible, the types of unspent convictions that are likely to be unacceptable for a given post. In complex cases, you will need to make a judgement. In doing this you should consider:

- whether the offence would cast doubt on the applicant's integrity or your reputation;
- whether the offence would affect the applicant's ability to do the job;
- whether the conviction is relevant to a particular post;
- the length of time since the offence occurred;
- the age of the applicant at the time;
- the nature and background of the offence
- seriousness of the offence;
- whether there is a pattern of offences;
- the conduct and character of the applicant since the offence; and
- the explanation offered by the applicant.

Financial checks

Financial checks are unlikely to be required for every post; they are most likely for sensitive positions, and particularly those handling money/funds. They are not seen as a core aspect of pre-employment screening – they are dealt with more fully in NSV and other specialised screening assessment models. This chapter aims only to provide a brief overview of financial checks.

Types of checks

A range of information is available on an applicant's financial background, including:

- credit information listed at the applicant's current and previous addresses, including County Court Judgments (CCJs), Voluntary Agreements or bankruptcies;
- a credit history report from a credit reference agency;
- a Companies House⁶ search, to confirm whether the applicant holds any current or previous directorships, or appears on the Disqualified Directors Register; or
- searches against the Financial Conduct Authority's Financial Services Register⁷.

A number of companies, including commercial screening services, can search an applicant's details across financial service/credit databases combined with other screening checks (see the chapter on commercial sector screening companies). Combined with verifying identity, employers are able to discover relevant financial data.

For posts requiring financial checks, you may wish to consider appropriate questions on the application form, for example: 'have you ever been the subject of a County Court Judgment (CCJ) or Voluntary Agreement?'

Interpreting results

Interpreting financial data is likely to require a greater degree of judgement than other pre-employment checks. For example, what constitutes an adverse credit history? This could include an unsustainable lifestyle or bad payment history. Consideration should be given to the ability and concerted efforts made to repay debts. Clear guidelines will help to ensure that your judgements are consistent and defensible.

Overseas checks

Employers are often faced with undertaking employment checks on overseas applicants and those who have lived and worked outside the UK. It is important to verify their credentials because they may exaggerate employment overseas in the belief that the details will not be checked, or wish to conceal adverse information (e.g. a criminal record).

UK applicants should give a reasonable account of any significant periods spent abroad. This can range from anything over three months, although BS7858:2019 stipulates 31 days or more.

Operating conditions, the quality of record keeping (e.g. electronic or manual records), whether records are stored at a national or regional level, and legal constraints abroad can impede and add time to the screening process. This can result in some employers adopting a 'best you can approach' when checking overseas candidates.

Managing the risk

There may be occasions when the business need will dictate that applicants are taken on as soon as is practically possible. In such instances an initial identity and right to work check might be carried out, with temporary and managed access to the site allowed. In the meantime, more thorough employment screening checks should be carried out in the country where the applicant has most recently resided. Full employment would be conditional on the satisfactory completion of checks.

However, it might not be possible to employ the applicant where the required checks cannot be carried out or sufficient assurance cannot be obtained by other means. This should not reflect on the honesty or integrity of the applicant, merely that the required background checks in the country of residence prior to arriving in the UK were not possible. Alternatively, you might decide to employ the applicant, applying a range of personnel security measures that reflect the level of risk entailed in allowing access without the required information or assurance being available (see NPSA's Ongoing Personnel Security: a good practice guide).

UK applicants with time spent overseas

You should request documentation accounting for time spent abroad. Examples include:

- proof of itinerary;
- suitable proof of residence for time spent abroad, e.g. document from landlord;
- overseas employee or academic references/certificates, including UK departments and agencies based overseas (e.g. Foreign Commonwealth and Development Office missions, British Council or Non-Governmental Organisations);
- bank/credit card statements; and
- character references, quoting dates and places of meeting.

Applicants should be informed that, if they provide any of the references above, they will be independently verified. Confirmation of dates can be cross-referenced with passport, work permits, internet searches, and contacting employers/educational establishments.

Overseas criminal record checks

Employers may want to confirm whether an applicant has a history of criminal convictions in another country. The additional time to acquire overseas criminal record checks must be factored into recruitment procedures, and to highlight this requirement early in the process to prevent unnecessary delays.

NPSA's How to obtain an Overseas Criminal Record Check provides advice to employers and applicants on obtaining criminal record checks in 63 countries. It provides information on:

- who can apply for a criminal record check (in many countries this is limited to the applicant, but can also include employers or third parties);
- where to apply, both in-country and from the UK;
- the type of certificate issued (e.g. certificate of conviction, certificate of conduct) and language issued in;
- the cost of a check; and
- expected turnaround times.

For instances where a country is not listed in this guidance, you should visit the criminal records checks for overseas applicants page on the GOV.UK website: www.gov.uk/government/publications/criminal-records-checks-for-overseas-applicants. If the country you are looking for is still not listed, you may wish to contact the country's representative in the United Kingdom (www.gov.uk/government/publications/foreign-embassies-in-the-uk).

Employers should be minded that the categories of criminal convictions differ from country to country, and that the laws governing rehabilitation of offenders also vary significantly. In some instances criminal records are expunged either automatically after a period of time or after a time linked to the length of the original sentence.

Conducting your own overseas checks

You may wish to consider using your own overseas checks. A good starting point would be the relevant country's UK embassy or high commission, which may be in a position to explain how certain processes work, and provide relevant contacts.

You can follow the guidance in the chapter on qualification and employment checks. The internet can also be a useful tool in verifying overseas employers, educational establishments and referees.

NPSA's Personnel Security in Offshore Centres looks at personnel security measures in 14 countries commonly used for outsourcing and offshoring. It describes the range of pre-employment screening measures permissible in those countries, as well as ongoing personnel security measures.

Employers should allow additional time when undertaking pre-employment screening from overseas, including breaks and semesters in academic years in regard to qualifications checks, and allowing time for translations for criminal record certificates, references etc.

Hiring an external screening service

Some employers outsource their overseas checks to an external screening company. These companies are explored further in the chapter commercial sector screening companies. They are likely to offer some of the following advantages:

- foreign language capability;
- knowledge of the country including cultural issues and legislation;
- ability to conduct business during unsocial working hours (e.g. with the Far East);
- offices or links with screening companies in specific countries;
- a good understanding of the length of the screening process; and
- a good knowledge of the reliability of country specific information e.g. government records.

You should understand how screening companies undertake their checks, including records and databases they have access to. If they do not have offices in the appropriate countries, how will they work (e.g. a local screening company)?

Media searches

It is common for employers to consider an applicant's 'online reputation', i.e. the evaluation of an applicant based on their online behaviour and what they and others post about them. NPSA's Media Screening: use of the internet in employment decisions provides advice to employers on using the internet to inform their employment decisions. This chapter provides a brief overview of media searches explored in the guide, and their relevance to employment screening.

What applicants do or say on the internet may incur reputational or security risks to the employer. Media searches may therefore be required if the applicant will have access to sensitive material or sites within the organisation, or depending on their duties or responsibilities. Media searches can help verify identity, confirm or resolve concerns about suspicious behaviour, or establish how security aware the applicant is (for example, the information disclosed in the applicant's profile on a social networking site, or the permissions granted for other users to view their profile). Potential conflicts of interest may also be identified.

Media searches must be necessary, proportionate and transparent. If the employer has no justifiable reason for conducting media searches, then they should not be done. Searches must also comply with relevant legislation (e.g. DPA, HRA, and employment law). Only online information which can be publicly accessed should be researched. If results are recorded, they must be stored securely and retained for as long as there is a genuine business requirement.

There are risks inherent with media searches:

- Information on the internet may be inaccurate or unreliable, with little or no prospect of verifying the information.
- The information must relate to the applicant, and not someone of the same name.
- Is their applicant attempting to build themselves up through their online behaviour?
- You should be mindful of third-party views or opinions.
- You should be mindful of your own views. Online activity you might consider unacceptable may be second nature to younger internet users.

Applicants should be informed that all sources of information available to the organisation may be reviewed to assess their suitability for employment. You should include in your screening policies thresholds for what online material or internet usage is deemed to be adverse, and what the impact of adverse information would be on the organisation and its existing employees. Applicants should be given the opportunity to discuss their online activities, for example at interview.

You should decide who carries out media searches (i.e. yourselves, or a third party screening company). You should be clear on your requirements (and your reasons for them), and the value of such searches. You should refrain from reaching a decision on whether to employ based solely on the results of media searches. These must be added to all other information at your disposal to reach a fair and balanced decision.

Commercial sector screening companies

There has been a steady growth in screening companies. Some focus on only providing employment checks (e.g. verification of identity, employment and qualification checks), while others provide more specialised services, such as drug and alcohol testing or investigations. Larger screening companies can act as umbrella organisations for criminal record checks.

Screening companies often (but not exclusively) use online automated software solutions to perform and manage the screening process. Both the employer and the applicant may be able to log-on to a web-based service to view the progress of checks, and for the applicant to provide consent should further checks be required.

A commercial sector screening company may be able to offer a number of advantages:

- Reduced costs – it may be cheaper, faster, more accurate and more cost efficient than in-house employment screening.
- Fast results – identity verification checks can provide results in seconds.
- High degree of flexibility – it should be able to provide a flexible, high quality service to meet your specific needs.
- Global reach – it may be able to offer multi-lingual skills to conduct checks overseas. It can perform checks in any time zone, no matter what time it is in the UK.
- Cutting edge technologies – increasing competition and research and development by screening companies can help to keep them at the forefront of advances in pre-employment screening techniques.
- Compliance – it can often provide a service which is compliant and compatible with industry standards (e.g. BS7858 and ISO 27001 – the international standard for information security management). However, it should demonstrate how it meets these standards.

What you should consider about screening companies

- The final decision on recruitment rests with the employer, regardless of the involvement of the third party screening company.
- Can the company really live up to its promotional material? The standard and quality of screening services vary.
- You should ensure that you know a great deal about the company and service being offered before you make your decision. You should ask to speak to some of their existing clients.
- Have they done their research about your organisation?
- What information can the company access?
- Do they offer expertise and experience in the assessment of inconsistent or inaccurate screening results? Do they offer gap analysis?
- How is an applicant's data stored and protected?
- Do you have the right to audit (in detail) how and when they screen?
- What level of screening do their staff undergo?
- A competitive market increases the pressure on screening companies to produce results quickly. How can they ensure that a high quality standard of screening will always be met?

Secure contracting

A contractor is defined as an individual who is not an employee of an organisation, but who has a direct or indirect contractual relationship to provide services to the hiring company or ‘contracting authority’. A contractor may be an individual worker engaged by the contracting authority directly under a contract for services, or engaged to work for the contracting authority through a contracting company or agency. In large projects, a contracting authority may engage a third party company, who will supply their own staff and may in turn recruit further levels of subcontract workers.

Contractors can provide vital skills and expertise that cannot be developed internally for the same cost within the same timescales. However, contractors should undergo the same level of pre-employment screening as permanent employees with the same levels of access.

NPSA's Personnel Security and Contractors: a good practice guide for employers provides advice on employing contractors. However, the following should be considered in a employment screening context:

Risk assessment

Contractors should be risk assessed according to the same process as permanent staff. The risk assessment should ensure that the level of employment screening carried out for the contractor(s) reflects the level of access/responsibility associated with the role and that of a permanent employee undertaking a similar role.

Accountability

It is important to ensure that someone in the organisation is accountable for the employment screening of contractors. It may be helpful for this to be the same person who is responsible for the screening of permanent staff.

Embedding employment screening in contracts

Contracts should outline the checks required for each post and detail how these are to be performed. There are three ways in which the checks can be conducted:

1: Contracting authority performs employment screening checks on all contractors

The contracting authority should write into all contracts that contractors will be subject to employment screening, and that their ability to work will be subject to the successful completion of the checks. This allows the contracting authority to retain control of the screening process, and to ensure that appropriate standards are met and retained.

2: Contracting company/agency performs employment screening

There should be a requirement that all contracting companies must pre-screen those who will work on the contract. They should be able to demonstrate that the checks have been carried out satisfactorily, and the contracting authority should reserve the right to audit their processes. A clause stating that the contracting company will be liable for financial penalties if staff have not been adequately screened should also be included. These requirements should cascade from contract to sub-contract.

3: Third party pre-employment screening

The contracting authority should write into contracts a requirement that contractors will be subject to employment screening checks by a third party screening company. It should be able to demonstrate that the checks have been carried out satisfactorily, and the contracting authority should reserve the right to audit their processes.

Dealing with adverse information

Contracting authorities should put in place a process with the contracting company for dealing with adverse information, stating the thresholds for refusal to work for the organisation as part of the contract. This should include the disclosure of criminal record convictions where appropriate. Processes should be in place for the contracting company to refer the decision making process back to you as the contracting authority ahead of any decision to proceed to engage the individual.

Confirming the identity of contractors

Systems should be in place to confirm that the person who arrives for work is the person the contracting company supplied and screened to work for the contracting authority. The contracting authority and company can exchange photographs and names to enable verification on initial employment.

Managing the risk through supervised access

If it is not possible to screen contractors to the same standard as permanent staff, the contracting authority should escort them whilst they are on site, or implement additional physical security measures such as zoned/controlled access and distinguishable security passes.

Re-engaging contractors

When a contractor is engaged on more than one occasion in the same organisation, it should not be assumed that their circumstances have remained unchanged between periods of engagement. At the beginning of each period of re-engagement, the contracting authority should ensure that the contractor poses no greater risk than previously. Depending on the time elapsed, this could range from a short series of questions confirming that the contractor's circumstances are no greater than during the initial period of engagement, to a repeat of the entire employment screening process. This requirement should be stipulated in all contracts.

Audit

Where a contracting company or third party is performing employment screening checks, it is important that the contracting authority quality assures this process through audits. When conducting an audit the contracting authority should ensure that:

- the right to audit is specified in the contract;
- reasonable notice should be given to the contracting company prior to any audit;
- the audit policy is consistent with the contracting authority's requirements;

- the contracting company or third party has a named individual responsible for their pre-employment screening policy;
- the contracting company or third party's screening processes conform to the standards set out in the contract;
- the audit process is independent and transparent. Terms of reference should be agreed with the contracting company before commencing the audit to ensure the purpose and scope of the audit is clear; and
- the contracting company complies with relevant legislation (e.g. the DPA, HRA and employment legislation).

Decision making

Hopefully, the majority of your screening will come back with no adverse traces, and you can proceed to employ the applicant. However, what are the considerations when dealing with gaps and adverse information? At what point do you decide not to proceed with the applicant if information is very slow to arrive from overseas? How do you interpret criminal record history or an adverse finance check?

In many organisations, the business manager will often have responsibility for making a final judgment as to whether to progress with the applicant in instances where there are time delays, where information is lacking, or where gaps exist. HR should report to the business manager on the progress on each screening case periodically and as early as possible.

In complex cases or where additional assurance is required, decisions should involve the business areas that have a vested interest. This should include Security, HR and the business manager, as well as a lawyer where complex legal decisions need to be considered. Guidance on how to set up a group can be found in NPSA's guidance "Additional Assurance for NSV roles".

Checks should be considered on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the full range of information and, in the case of criminal conviction data, the nature and seriousness of the crime. Consideration should be given to the role that the applicant will be undertaking, their integrity, the severity and patterns relating to criminal records data, as well as mitigating circumstances.

It simply might not be possible to recruit the applicant as sufficient assurances might not be gained regarding gaps in information. This should not reflect adversely on the applicant or cast any doubt on their character. Alternatively, it might be possible to manage the applicant through controlled access and/or supervision until all outstanding checks have been successfully completed.

In all instances, you should record your decision and your reasons for granting or refusing employment. This is important for auditing purposes and responding to possible challenges by the applicant or employee in future.

Appendix 5: Criminal convictions – rehabilitation periods

The legislation governing spent convictions has changed. The ROA 1974 has been amended by the LASPO Act 2012, and changes came into effect in March 2014. For most minor sentences (e.g. cautions, reprimands or fines), rehabilitation periods begin from the date of conviction. However, for convictions resulting in a custodial or community sentence, the rehabilitation period now starts at the end of the entire sentence (as opposed to the point of release from prison). Custodial sentences of more than four years can never become spent.

These changes are retrospective. This means that those convicted before the changes came into force are affected by the changes. The following table outlines rehabilitation periods:

Sentence	Rehabilitation period		Notes
	People aged over 18	People aged under 18
Prison – more than 30 months and less than 4 years	Sentence + 7 years	Sentence + 3.5 years	From the day on which the sentence (including any licence period) is completed.

Prison – less than 6 months	Sentence + 2 years	Sentence + 18 months	From the day on which the sentence (including any licence period) is completed.
Sentence of detention -between 6-30 months	Sentence + 4 years	Sentence + 2 years	Passed under s91 of the Criminal Courts Sentencing Act 2000 or s206 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975.
